The social inclusion of different

of the Rural Development Programme of the Czech Republic for the period 2007–2013. The fourth axis of the programme is devoted to the method and, as such, it establishes an inclusive and participatory bottom-up approach. This approach is concerned especially with a target social group of farmers and agricultural entrepreneurs, and the participants in the local action groups constitute the National Network of Local Action Groups (LAGs) in the Czech Republic. With regard to this role of farmers and agricultural entrepreneurs in LAGs was tested using a questionnaire-based method testing a hypothesis of external vs. internal inclusion/exclusion (Kocourek, 2010) of farmers into/from local action groups. The results show that participation differs in the local action groups, but generally speaking, the position of agricultural subjects is decreasing off the subjects from different spheres (especially
