

Astrophysicists find fractal nature of Sun's 'stealth sources' inspired on Solar Wind

1 May 2007 Warwick University
1 May 2007 Warwick University
1 May 2007 Please astrophysicists at the University of Warwick have found key information about the Sun's 'stealth sources' in long-term solar activity cycles that could help predict solar eruptions in the near future. This research spans up to 100 years of looking at full space weather and the variable behaviour that affects the operation of fusion-powered power plants.

1 May 2007 © University of Warwick 2007

Please astrophysicists at the University of Warwick have found key information about the Sun's 'stealth sources' in long-term solar activity cycles that could help predict solar eruptions in the near future. This research spans up to 100 years of looking at full space weather and the variable behaviour that affects the operation of fusion-powered power plants.

This research spans up to 100 years of looking at full space weather and the variable behaviour that affects the operation of fusion-powered power plants.

This research spans up to 100 years of looking at full space weather and the variable behaviour that affects the operation of fusion-powered power plants.

更多... | 来自于: | 特别推荐 | ICPG2004年会 | 公司简介 | 联系方式 | 友情链接

北京思拓利软件有限公司 Copyright © 2003-2009 ICPG All Rights Reserved