| Publications                  | Abstract:This paper focuses on the determinants of the labor market situation of young people in developedcountries and the developing world, with a special emphasis on the role of vocational training andeducation policies. We highlight the role of demographic factors, economic growth and labor marketinstitutions in explaining young people's transition into work. We then assess differences in the setupand functioning of the vocational education and training policies in major world regions, as an importantdriver of differential labor market situation of youth. Based on our analysis we argue in favor ofvocational education and training systems combining work experience and general education and givesome policy recommendations regarding the implementation of education and training systemsadapted to a country's economic and institutional context.Text: See Discussion Paper No. 6890 |                 |                |                 |                        |                        |
