The future of our profession depends considerably on the extent to which we are able to design and conduct carefully conceived clinical trials of interventions targeting important clinical problems in pediatric psychology and on the effectiveness of our communication and dissemination of those results. Within the past few years, the Journal of Pediatric Psychology has made several appeals to its readership and put forth a variety of efforts to encourage the publication of randomized controlled trials of psychological interventions conducted in the context of pediatric health care and to enhance the broader impact of those publications. A 2003 issue of the journal included two papers (McGarth, Stinson, & Davidson, 2003¹; Stinson, McGrath, & Yamada, 2003²) and an editorial (Brown, 2003³) . . . [Full Text of this Article]
