Visiting scholars from Eastern Europe and Central Asia will spend a few days at the University of Kansas before going on to teach at colleges and universities across the United States.

Visitors will also be the focus of a three-day international conference on Jan. 11-13.

The program is designed for the 40 scholars who have been invited by the United States and its higher education system before they go to their host institutions for the summer. Four of the scholars will remain at KU for the spring semester.

Orientation activities include presentations about intercultural conflict, higher education and American society. Participants can also attend social activities such as bonfires and folk dancing.

Sponsored by the U.S. State Department, the development program increases access to academic resources and new educational perspectives and promotes the development of a growing network of academics in the United States and countries in the former Soviet Union. Four staff members from the American Councils for International Education, which coordinates the program, will participate along with KU faculty and staff. In addition, Olivia Brinck from the KU has hosted scholars since the program began in 1993. This is the university's first time to host the orientation. Twenty of the scholars attended the Applied English Center for a month before the orientation for language and culture instruction. This is the second year the center has provided part of the program.
