Development of Slovak agricultural agricultural production during the transition period

Agric. Econ. — Czech, 49
539

The economic importance of the agricultural sector in Slovakia declined during the transition period. There are several reasons for this: declining agricultural trade, extreme transformation of agriculture unclear property rights in the period, short-run privatization transformation of up and down sectors, world market fluctuations of real wages, low stability policy and other. The development economic market was parallel to activity in political market.
