King's College London, the Family and Parenting Institute, and Parenting UK, have been awarded £10 million by the Department for Education to create a new centre of excellence called the National Academy for Parenting Practitioners, which will carry out parenting research and provide quality support for parents. Based at the Strand Campus it will be launched in October 2007.

Dr Stephen Scott, Head of the King's College London Parenting Unit, comments: "King's is delighted to be hosting the Academy. It will bring its expertise in training practitioners to approaches proven to work to help all parents bring the best out of their children. It will also carry out an ambitious research programme to find out the best ways to help children and young people achieve

"We know a great deal about effective parenting and what interventions work best in what settings, but most of these have not yet been tested on a large country-wide scale in 'real-life' populations. Establishing this Academy will centralize the know-how and the manpower to enable the swift implementation of quality parenting support across the UK."
