

Perspectives on Sexual and Reproductive Health
Volume 35, Number 5, September/October 2003

SPECIAL REPORT

Man2Man: A Promising Approach to Addressing The Sexual and Reproductive Health Needs of Young Men

By Genevieve Sherrow, Tristan Ruby, Paula K. Braverman, Nathalie Bartle, Shawn Gibson and Linda Hock-Long

DOI:10.1363/3521503

Full text in PDF

Full-featured version available to subscribers

Personal subscribers should contact Wiley customer service with any questions related to their online access. Phone: 1 (800) 835-6770 or E-mail: cs-journals@wiley.com.

- » table of contents
- » search the PSRH archive
- » guidelines for authors

Genevieve Sherrow is research associate, Tristan Ruby is manager of adolescent programs, Shawn Gibson is director of adolescent programs, and Linda Hock-Long is director of research—all at the Family Planning Council, Philadelphia. At the time Man2Man was developed and implemented, Paula K. Braverman was chief of adolescent medicine, St. Christopher's Hospital for Children, and associate professor of pediatrics, Drexel University College of Medicine, Philadelphia; she is currently director of community program development, Division of Adolescent Medicine, Cincinnati Children's Hospital, Cincinnati. Nathalie Bartle is associate dean of student affairs and professor of community health and prevention, Drexel University School of Public Health.