Concerned with a wide range of contemporary problems related to the development and conservation of human resources, CHRR is responsible for developing state-of-the-art survey software, designing survey instruments, overseeing field work, and generating and disseminating fully documented data sets to researchers in government, private research organizations, and universities around the world. These interests range from the production of substantive analyses of economic, social, and psychological aspects of individual labor market behavior to examining the impact of government programs and policies.

In addition to conducting a diverse number of surveys, CHRR staff members continue to contribute innovative applications of ideas and technology to the field of survey methodology.

Seeking assistance with your next survey? We can help you with survey creation, survey data collection, and access to completed survey data and reports. Contact us now!
